TANGLED AGAIN.

Another and really threatening angle to the Russian-Polish problem has developed as a result of the action of the French government in announcing its recognition of the government of General Wrangel as the de facto government of South Russia at the moment when Great Britain is trying to negotiate a peace with the Russian Soviet. When the first news of the French action reached England, the British premier tried to discredit it, but now it has been officially confirmed. Newspapers throughout England spoke of the occurrence with a strong note of apprehension in their editorial columns, and whisperings of strained relations between the entente allies could be heard.

Both parties to the new controversy recognize the seriousness of it and both are inclined to make some compromise in the affair so that peace may be made between the warring nations of the east. Lloyd George and the English press take the view that the recognition impairs the chance of making peace between Poland and the Soviet. The real danger lies, according to the English view, in the fact that Poland may take the recognition as an indication that the allies are going to support an active war against the Soviet government and will attempt to continue aggressive action against the Russians, just at the time when reports say that the British premier has assured the Soviet delegation that he favors the establishment of peace. The assertion that Britain through its premier does desire peace is borne out in the dispatches which tell of his note to General Wrangel warning him that any aggressive action on his part hereafter will be on his own responsibility. In other words, England threatens to withdraw the moral and material support which she has hitherto given to the various governments opposed to the bolsheviks and is determined to make peace so that she may devote herself to the domestic problems which are pressing for solution within the island itself.

The French profess to see in President Wilson's note to Italy approval of their stand on the question of aggressive action against the Soviet. The note pledged the support "with all available means" of the territorial integrity of Poland, but the state department is silent on just how far this support will go. The French seem determined to fight the bolsheviks with material rather than with moral forces, and their recognition of Wrangel at this time may have been for the purpose of sounding out the other nations of the world. Thus another wedge is driven into the close relationship which has bound England and France together through the war. The action of Lloyd George in warning General Wrangel in no uncertain terms means simply that England does not intend to follow the recognition of France and that she will no longer countenance attacks upon the Soviet, not because she has any more liking for that form of government than she has had in former times, but because she realizes the need for peace and because her internal problems are such that she dares not attempt an unpopular war at this time. It is evident that Lloyd George sincerely desires peace and that he with his associates have determined that the best treatment for the ill of bolshevism is simply to leave it alone to run its unhappy course, finally dying because it fails to provide those things which every successful government must provide for its people—the right to a part in their government and to security in their property and in their home affairs.

In the same speech the premier, in one of his straight-from-the-shoulder remarks, informs British labor that any attempt to dictate the policy of the government by industrial action would be regarded as a blow aimed at the root of the democratic constitution of England and that it would be resisted with the entire strength of the forces of the nation. Thus two determined policies of the English government are made known to the world in one day and in both decisions Lloyd George as premier will no doubt be supported by large majorities of the English nation.

THERE'S ONE BORN EVERY MINUTE.

The unfortunate customers of Charles Ponzi who entrusted their money to him in the hopes of getting a return of 50 per cent every 45 days seem to be left with only regrets on their hands, but very little sympathy need be wasted upon them, for some other imaginary scheme would have come to their attention and they would have sunk their savings just as freely into it. Ponzi has been arrested and officers of other concerns are under arrest with him. They may be brought to trial and some of them will even receive jail sentences in all probability, but the ones who were duped will remain at large to sink more money into just such fantastic schemes in the future.

The entire affair can be reduced to the get-rich-quick madness of the world, which has tainted all classes of society. It brought ruin to the Hanover Trust company and the taint of it is found in all classes of sport to such an extent that they will rapidly lose their popularity unless it is stamped out. Ponzi's attempt to gain riches was merely more spectacular than many which are going on each day throughout the country, but in almost all cases the perpetrator of the fraud ends up either in prison, or, if he has escaped legally, in distress and need outside. Less gambling on the long shots and more honest effort is what is needed in the world today, for wealth is created by work, and work alone.

Senator Harding touches a keynote in his assertion that the great need of the world today is hard work and greater production. "This is no time for any man or group of men to talk of minimum production. This is a time when the world needs maximums. It needs work, more work and still more work."

At recent wool sales, many offerings have had to be withdrawn because of the lack of buyers. Wool is as unsalable in England today as in the United States.

Occasionally some one drops into the office and reminds us of the old days when five or ten cents would buy something.

Prices— Up or Down?

High prices for livestock increase the producer's income. Low prices decrease it and even result in losses. Similarly, high prices for meat increase consumer's expenses.

But Swift & Company as a middleman does not benefit by high or low prices. Our income depends not on a high level of prices or a low level, but rather on the margin between the livestock price and the meat and by-products price.

The company's only concern, in whether prices should be high or low, is that they should be high enough to satisfy producers and low enough to please consumers; but over the movement of these prices Swift & Company has no control.

Swift & Company is compelled by competition to pay high enough prices for livestock to secure an adequate supply. We must sell meat at a price low enough to make it move. We endeavor also, between the two prices, to secure a margin large enough to pay all expenses and yield a fair profit.

Our profit for 1919 averaged less than two cents on each dollar of sales, or 6% per cent on money invested.
